

Emerging Colleges

GROWING giants

Many new colleges are already rivalling illustrious institutes on the quality of education they offer

Naseer Ahmed Gani is no ordinary student. At 19, this engineering student has already grabbed the attention of international space research centres with his new-age lunar buggy. Designed and manufactured by Gani and his friends at Lovely Professional University (LPU), Phagwara, the rover vehicle, which can be used to explore the moon surface, was recently displayed at the Delhi Auto Expo in February along with 15 other automobiles made by the students at the university. "Our focus this year has shifted from infrastructure to industry and academic exposure. There is so much that young students can achieve when given the right opportunities," says Aman Mittal, LPU director.

Like LPU, many of the new colleges in India may not have an illustrious history or vast alumni base but they are ready to make up for it through better academic infrastructure and exposure. Whether it's a student team from Jindal Law School, Sonipat, winning the coveted Price Media Law Moot Court hosted at Oxford University, or students from the Mahatma Gandhi National Institute of Medical Sciences, Jaipur receiving a full scholarship from the Harvard Public School of Health to present a paper at the Global Maternal Health Conference in Tanzania this year, prestigious laurels and accomplishments are quickly getting lapped up today by colleges and institutes that are only four or five years old. "We must break free of the mindset that quality education is restricted to the few elite public universities. There are many new institutes that offer the same, if not better quality of education," says G. Raghurama, director of BITS, Pilani.

Noida's Galgotias University shares the same views. "One must note that 70 per cent of students
